Top tips for your first 90 days

What makes the difference between a plan that lands and one that stalls.

1 Book your listening sessions in week one

Calendars fill fast once people know you are in post. Put the one-to-ones and team visits in the diary before anything else, so listening does not get squeezed out by requests.

2 Ask your sponsor to do something, not just support

Agree one visible action your senior sponsor will take by day 90, such as opening a staff briefing or chairing the steering group. Support people can see carries more weight than support in principle.

3 Start with the data you already have

HR records, engagement survey results and exit interview themes often tell you more than a new survey would. Use them first, and save new data collection for the questions they cannot answer.

4 Choose quick wins that are visible and low cost

Rewording a job advert, making meetings more accessible or fixing an outdated policy shows progress early, without waiting for budget.

5 Write down what you will not do this quarter

Share it with your sponsor. Naming what is out of scope protects your capacity and sets honest expectations, which builds trust faster than trying to do everything.

6 Find one peer outside your organisation

Carrying this work alone is hard. A monthly check in with someone doing similar work elsewhere gives you a sounding board, fresh ideas and perspective when progress feels slow.

Why structure your first 90 days?

The first 90 days of an inclusion role or programme are among the highest-leverage moments available to you. Get it right and you build the credibility, relationships, and data you need to do meaningful work for years. Rush it and you risk launching work before you understand the landscape, alienating potential allies, or setting expectations you cannot meet.

The 30/60/90 structure is a discipline as much as a plan. It forces you to separate listening from planning and planning from launching: three things most people new to this work are tempted to do at once from day one.
